Henrique Ho
Pensacola, FL

... when 9/11 interrupted his studies, he went online to complete his degrees

After his traditional, brick-and-mortar studies were put on hold by a military transfer in the wake of 9/11, Henrique K. Ho turned to the University of Management and Technology, where he earned an Associate of Science in November 2008, and a Bachelor of Science in General Studies in June 2010.

If, like Henrique Ho and his family, you have moved your home address seven times in the last 10 years, then you can begin to appreciate some of the challenges the military life has in store for those who serve our great nation. However, tuition assistance, book loan programs, the flexibility of distance programs, and participation in consortia like the Servicemembers Opportunity Colleges (SOC) go a long way.

Henrique Ho is currently balancing the demands of providing logistics and material support to keep the Hornets and Hercules aircraft of the famous Blue Angels aloft, while pursuing a Master of Science in Management online with the University of Management and Technology.

"My education has been a long and difficult path. Many institutions set such discouraging requirements and obstacles, and I did not want to keep taking classes here and there. But my luck turned around in 2006 when I found UMT!"
